commanded by Lt. Heckman and Company B with Capt. Dick Gibson in command. Company C was to ford the river then turn slightly to the right and attack the "gray castle," a known German position near Amfreville. Stokely's company would make a strong show of firepower against the gray castle, then fall back to the farm orchard.

Company A, next in line, was to proceed through the orchard and go about one half mile on a country road turning slightly to the right at a road junction near LeMotey. Here they were to set up a blocking action to keep German reinforcements away from the La Fiere causeway. Company B, following Company A, would swing to the left to make an attack on Cauquigney. After their feint on the gray castle, Company C was to fall back and align on the right of Company B for the attack. This plan used the troops available to good advantage.

The battalion started moving at 2300 along the railroad which paralleled the river. The flooded Merderet River was several hundred yards wide at this point but narrowed down to about 100 yards at the ford. Engineers preceding the battalion had marked the ford with engineer's tape. The night was dark as Carl Crabtree, the lead man for Company C, made his way through the ford and along the farm road toward the orchard.

Forming a skirmish line in their feint on the gray castle, Company C opened up with a show of fire-power creating an eerie light in the darkness. Company A moved through the orchard and out on the road toward LeMotey. Company B was making the swing to the left toward Cauquigney Church and the causeway as Company C came back in line.

Lt. Buester Johnston and the men of his platoon in Company C were elated. They had done a lot of shooting and felt they had put the fear into the Germans. "They can't shoot worth a
